Section A: Prepared Reading

A lily in the kitchen

¹ Long ago in Egypt, workers stopped work on the Great Pyramid of Cheops when they did not get enough garlic to eat.

² The food the Egyptians liked so much belongs to the lily family. It is a bulb made up of small cloves shaped like narrow spoons. They may be white, green, or pale purple. Their thin skins give no hint of the strength inside. Garlic is not as mild as the onion and the leek. It has a very strong flavour.

³ Long ago the Romans and the Israelites loved to eat garlic. They hung garlic around their necks. They hoped it would ward off bad luck. They also thought it would keep them from getting sick.

⁴ A similar idea is still held. Many individuals take garlic thinking it will prevent or cure disease. It may help in another way. Its smell may force people to stay far apart. At least then they can't pass germs on to each other.

⁷ Strange as it seems, food may have a great deal of garlic in it without smelling or tasting strong. It all depends on how it is cooked.

⁸ French cooks make soup with whole cloves of garlic. They use more than thirty cloves in one kettle of soup. They take care not to crush or bruise them. They cook them whole. As a result, the strong oils stay in the cloves. As the cloves cook, they change in some strange way. The soup turns out to be delicious. It's not strong at all.

⁹ Garlic is used in more and more foods. It can be bought dried, making it easier to use. Most good cooks still say fresh garlic is better.

¹⁰ There is dried garlic in many prepared foods we buy. Soups, pickles, salad dressings and tinned meats all contain garlic. Most of these foods don't taste like garlic. But if the garlic were left out, they would lose most of their flavour. Dried garlic is even used in dog foods. Dogs seem to like garlic. They seem to appreciate what it does for the foods they eat.
